Max Siegel leads USA Track and Field. He says the course must match Olympic level demands. That means real hills. That means real heat. That means real challenge. Every city that bids have its own style. St. Louis showed strong teamwork. Groups like the Sports Commission worked together. GO! St. Louis joined the effort too. Siegel noticed this unity right away. He said it made a real difference. Alignment matters more than flashy promises. St. Louis proved it had both heart and structure.

The course design matters most. It must test real endurance. It must mirror tough race conditions. Flat courses do not prepare runners well. St. Louis needs turns. St. Louis needs elevation shifts. These elements build mental toughness early. Bureaucrats must think about Los Angeles Olympic 2028 terrain. That race will test runners hard. So, the trials should do the same.

LA 28 Tickets: Coordination Across City Leaders Drives Olympic Success

Strong events need strong teamwork. No single group can do this alone. City agencies must talk often. Sports groups must share their plans. Everyone must move in one direction. St. Louis already shows this strength. That strength must continue through March. Siegel praised this exact kind of unity. He said some cities lack it badly. One group cares deeply.
